In fact, the discovery by Rayer and Davaine of these filiform bodies in anthrax blood, like the previous revelations of Latour and Schwann concerning the yeast cells in fermenting liquids, fell upon irresponsible soil. Both were opposed to the scientific Zeitgeist prevailing when they were published, and both announcements were stifled and prevented from bearing fruit for many years, through the opposition which they encountered from the leaders of science of the time. This indifference is perhaps not so astonishing if we remember, that at this period leading scientific men, like Helmholtz, Ludwig, Brücke, Dubois Reymond, and their numerous followers, regarded the complete explanation of the phenomena of life on a physico-chemical basis as assured, and merely a question of time. Observations, therefore, which tended to shift the weighty responsibility of such complex phenomena as infection and disease upon...
